

About My Logo – the Rainbow Caduceus

This symbol depicts the Kundalini, which is represented by two snakes, winding its way back and forth around the Sushumna. The snakes are indicative of Ida (the feminine principle) and Pingala (the masculine principle), and, along with the Sushumna, these three vessels comprise the main ch'i arteries or Nadi. As they entwine the Sushumna, they create circles, wherein the Chakras rest. Chakras are the primary centers of electromagnetic energy in the body. The Infinity symbol atop the staff reminds us that everything is energy and energy cannot die. We go on for infinity.

This representation has absolutely no relationship to Hermes and Greek myth. The double serpent on the staff was solely a representation of the Kundalini coursing up the body from the perineum and sacrum to the crown of the head. The wings at the top of the staff actually represent the seventh chakra.

In Buddhist folklore, Buddha once meditated under the tree of the serpent king. When a rainstorm threatened to drench Buddha, a giant cobra wrapped himself around Buddha's body seven times and opened his hood to keep him dry.

I became attracted to this symbol in my teens, when my dream was to become a medical doctor. When I took a good look at the medical insignia last year, I realized only one snake was holding onto the staff. It was then it struck me, the medical profession only have half the picture. Energy Healing is the other half. Together, we can heal and cure. One day, maybe we will work side-by-side. This is my dream. My logo reminds me of this every time I see it.
